Course Objective:

Skin diseases are very common - from the time of birth to elderly, skin diseases may develop. Skin is also the largest organ of our body, it not only protects our internal milieu from external assaults such as microbes and UV light, but also produces vitamin D and regulates our body temperature. Furthermore, the skin has a social facet and may have heavy psychological impact on patients irrespective of allergy, tumors, drug eruption or vitiligo. General nurses may not have an adequate training about skin diseases, or sometimes misunderstand that dermatology is mainly about cosmetic procedures.

This course introduces some common skin diseases to the participants so that they can have a better understanding of their clinical features and management. It is hope that after the course, the participants can recognize common skin diseases and to refer patients in need to appropriate carers.
